ERSTWHILE POPULAR PORCH PAR-TIES ARE NO LONGER SO.

The Shirt-Waist Reception the Latest Suggestion-Names for the Baby.

For several seasons there was a great fancy for porch parties, but this year they have been very few. The porches at the rear of the house, which open into a garden or lawn, are the favorite ones, and the only porch parties are the informal ones where the company is not an invited one. Nor is there a fancy for the morning parties which were so numerous a few summers ago. When the weather becomes so excessively hot as it has been during the past week one does not like to think of the trouble of a company, and those who are invited are not particularly happy over having to put on the attire deemed necessary for a tea in the heat of the day. A young lady of this city is the guest at a house party in a northern city, and she writes home that the favorite entertainment is the shirt waist reception. The girls go in white duck or linen or pique skirts, with thin waists, and do not feel burdened with such costumes as they would were they to put on silk-lined organdies, covered with lace, and suffer the general uncomfortableness of being dressed up. If any one in this city has the courage to begin the shirt waist reception the guests will accept more readily than if it were the conventional reception. The question of entertainment for the multitudes seems to have resolved itself into wheel or street-car rides or suppers at Broad Ripple, the end of either the wheel or street car ride.

The question of names for the baby is one that is always being considered. Nicknames were generally used a half-dozen or and the baby is William, the mother is Maggie and the baby is Marguerite, the mother is Nannie and the little girl is Nancy, the mother is Fannie and the child the baby has the long name Elizabeth, the father is Ben and the kindergartner is Benjamin, the mother is Kittie and the wee miss is Katherine, unless she spells it another of the dozen ways, or the mother may be Jennie and the daughter Virginia, Jeannette or Jane, the mother Mollie and the daughter Mary. The return to the original name still holds good and seems likely to continue. The girls who are given the long name of Kate take all sorts of liberty in the spelling, and the original Catherine would have to pronounce it before she would recognize her name, for it is Katherine, Katharine, Kathryn, Cathryn and all the other variations, and even Kate is changed to Kayt.

The Cry of Rachel. I stand in the dark; I beat on the door: Let me in, Death.

Through the storm am I come; I find you before Let me in. Death. For him that is sweet, and for him that is small, I beat on the door, I cry, and I call: Let me in, Death.

For he was my bow of the almond-tree fair: Let me in, Death. You brake it; it whitens no more by the stair: Let me in, Death. For he was my lamp in the house of the Lord: You quenched it, and left me this dark and the Let me in, Death, that was rich do ask you for alms: Let me in, Death. I that was full uplift you stripped palms: Let me in, Death. Back to me now give the child that I had; Cast into mine arms my little sweet lad: Let me in, Death.

Are you grown so deaf that you cannot hear? Let me in, Death. Unclose the dim eye, and unstop the dull ear: Let me in, Death, will call so loud, I will cry so sore, You must for shame's sake come open the door: Let me in. Death. -Lizette Wordsworth Reese, in July Lippincott's.

THE KENTUCKY TRAPPISTS. How the Monks of Gethsemane Abbey Spend the Time.

New York Tribune. The abbey at Gethsemane, in which these ceremonies took place, lies only a short distance from the village of that name. the monastery all is peace and quiet, only a few miles further along the road are New Hope and Coon Hollow, where large distilleries, with noisy activity, turn out every day thousands of gallons of Kentucky's famous product. The people of the neighborhood seldom see anything of the busy monks and it is only when the big bell tolls that they are made aware of anything unusual in the monastery. The monks pass their days in silence and in solitude, speaking to no one-not even special dispensation permits them to make known their wants through the abbot. It is the custom of the Trappists to settle in localities where the land needs cultivation. and their sole Joy, apart from that which is spiritual, comes from the satisfaction which they feel at sight of barren lands transformed into fruitful, yielding gardens by their own persevering efforts.

The monks rise at 4 o'clock in the morn ing, and the hours until daylight are spent in prayer and penance. When it is light enough they begin the daily routine of sowing and reaping, varying this with religious exercises throughout the day. There are in the United States only two such monasteries-the one at Gethsemane and the other near Dubuque, la. In the entire world there are only about a thousand of these monks who have taken upon themer, solitude contemplation and privation.

selves this voluntary life of labor and pray-The order was founded in the year 400 by St. Bernard on much the same plan as i exists to-day. The discipline, however, was so great that for a time it was relaxed in 1100 it was restored by the Abbe of Citeaux, and the name Cistercian Monks was adopted. Some years later the rule was odified, but finally, in 1500, at the Abbey of La Trappe, the influence of Abbot Ruaz reinstated the rule of former years. and the name Trappists has clung to the order ever since.

As old age approaches the Trappist monk inds time from his other labors to begin the digging of his own grave, and when death overtakes him he is laid to rest wrapped only in his cowl, with the hood drawn down over his face. For thirty days thereafter a crucifix represents his place at table. and his wooden bowl of gruel and crust of bread are served the same as if he were

Within the walls of the Kentucky monastery men of wealth and prominence in the world's affairs have sought seclusion. Tragedies of love and disappointment and hopes unfulfilled have inspired more than one to seek its shadowy walls, while others have gone there inspired only by religious fervor. In the little graveyard where lie the remains of the monks who have passed away a plain tombstone marks the grave of one who was soldier in the army of Napoleon. After the battle of Waterloo he made his way to this country, broken hearted, and sought the monastery. Years passed, and the mont was without news of the outside world When at last he lay upon his death bed the abbot came to him.

"Brother," he said, "you have in all things bserved the rules of our order, but to us as to all men, it is given to make a last request before going into the world beyond. Whatever you have to ask now will be The dying monk, arousing himself with great effort, said that, though he had tried
